CHILD CARE IN AMERICA TODAY

INTRODUCTION

Nearly 11 million children under age 5 in the United States are in some type of child care arrangement every week.¹ On average, the children of working mothers spend 35 hours a week in child care.² About one-third of these children are in multiple child care arrangements so their parents can meet the need for child care during traditional and nontraditional working hours.³

The number of parents losing jobs, working part time, taking pay cuts or working two or more jobs reflects the reality associated with the weak economy of the last few years. Parents are forced to make difficult decisions about the care of their children.

As this report shows, the average annual cost of full-time care for an infant in center-based care can range from about $4,600 in Mississippi to $20,200 in the District of Columbia, and from about $4,000 in Mississippi to $12,350 in the District of Columbia for an infant in a family child care home. It is not much better for the annual cost of care for a 4-year-old. Center-based care ranges from about $3,900 in Mississippi to $15,450 in the District of Columbia and from about $3,850 in Mississippi to $9,600 in New York state for care in a family child care home.

Anecdotal evidence from Child Care Resource and Referral agencies (CCR&Rs) across the country as well as newspaper stories throughout the states shows families are struggling to make ends meet. This financial insecurity leads some parents to decide to remove children from organized child care and make do with whatever arrangements they can find and/or afford. Unlike a mortgage or rent or a car payment, child care is an area where parents seek to find savings – and keep their fingers crossed that all will go well.

Ironically, in a weakened economy, the stress placed on families makes quality child care settings even more important to the healthy development of children.

The quality of child care has a lasting impact. A National Institute of Child Health and Human Development (NICHD) report found that high-quality child care leads to more positive outcomes even during the teenage years. Children who received high-quality care in the first few years of life scored higher in measures of academic and cognitive achievement when they were 15 years old and were less likely to misbehave than those who were enrolled in lower quality child care. Even 10 years after children left child care, experiences in quality settings were still related to higher academic achievement.⁴

It is essential for America's future economic prosperity that our children receive quality, developmentally appropriate care. However, as working families struggle with the costs of child care, they also find that the availability of the quality of care varies greatly.

Child Care Aware® of America and individual state and local CCR&Rs support parents as they make tough decisions about child care. CCR&Rs work within every state to help families find access to affordable, quality child care. CCR&Rs are uniquely positioned within communities to not only work with parents, but also with child care providers and state and local governments to strengthen the quality of care.

In the United States, about 90 percent of the cost of child care is assumed by parents. This is supplemented by more than $10 billion in government money that is spent annually by the states for child care. For the most part, funding for child care comes from the Child Care and Development Block Grant (CCDBG), the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) program, the Social Services Block Grant (SSBG or Title XX) and state funds.

Since the nature of these funds is a block grant, states have wide discretion about how to spend this money. CCDBG is the primary source of federal funds for child care, but requirements in the law are subject to broad interpretation. As a result, each state crafts its own standards and oversight policies.

Over the past six years, Child Care Aware® of America has reviewed and scored state licensing regulations for child care centers and small family child care homes. The 2012 report about state laws and policies for small family child care homes shows that state requirements were minimal. On average, states earned only 46 percent of all available points.⁵ The 2011 report about state laws and policies for child care centers found that states fared only a little better for their center regulations, earning an average of only 58 percent of all available points.⁶

Our conclusion after six years of studying child care regulations and oversight is that we still cannot say with confidence that America's children are protected by state licensing and oversight systems. Nor can we say that child care policies are in place to help young children learn and be ready for school.

This document provides information about key indicators that describe child care nationally and in individual states. The report is divided into two sections. The data in the first section documents the need for and use of child care in the United States. It includes information about the current cost, quality and impact of child care on America's children, families and the economy. It also provides key data from the nation's CCR&R system about services provided by CCR&Rs and the impact of CCR&Rs on parents and child care providers.

In the second section, the individual state child care fact sheets provide information about the number of children in the state and the number of low-wage families; the number of children younger than age 6 with parents in the labor force; the number of women in the labor force; average child care costs and median family incomes; child care subsidy participation numbers; child care supply; child care demand; child care workforce numbers; and training and technical assistance provided by the nation's CCR&Rs.

Data were gathered from federal and national sources and from State CCR&R Networks and other CCR&Rs surveyed in early 2012. In some states, mid-year transitions in statewide contracting of CCR&R services or the absence of a state network caused difficulty in reporting 2011 statewide training and referral data. In several states, cost data are only available every two years from the state market rate survey. In three states (Alabama, Louisiana and West Virginia), no 2011 data were reported by the CCR&Rs. Child care capacity was provided by the state child care administrator's office in these states.

In every state, child care can be hard to find, difficult to afford and is likely to be of mediocre quality. State licensing standards vary greatly, with few states meeting the most basic standards to ensure that children are safe and learning while in child care.

Child Care in America: 2012 State Fact Sheets is useful to program administrators, policymakers and child care advocates as they make decisions about child care programs and expenditures. It provides the data to better understand America's working families and the circumstances families face as they balance working to support their families with providing their children with child care that is safe, healthy and promotes early learning.
